

The Game

A game company, the oldest game company in north America was deciding who would be the next president of the company.

After a time of pursuit and promise, the decision came down to two individuals.

The first gentleman, was long time and cogent individual involved in the company. His entire life was dedicated to designing systems for the company, overseeing the practical elements of the largest game company in north America. Practical elements include the real and the possible effects that hold the company together, with all its people, and its effects in worldwide scenarios which considering such made him the practical and safest candidate for the job.

The other fellow, it turns out, was from outside the company but who had exemplified his status as a champion game “player” in fact, in common vernacular he was a “player”, who had great gains and subsequently great losses but continued jumping the hurdles; never abandoned by his youthful ambitions of success and admiration in his efforts.

Of course the first candidate was not noticed for outrageous success because he was a dedicated company and family man looking to a future of stability not huge wins at the risk of internal implosion.

Some of the games the company produced could be imagined in the likeness of the games of monopoly, the games of Risk, and Stratego, the game of Life, Twister, and games of other dynamics reflecting either thought or social conditions and realities. More like a government if you will.

Watching the “player” run through his monopoly like franchises, his rise and fall in the game of Life, his ability to win at twister, etc... ultimately the player did not pass go, and did not collect the $200. Instead he landed on the other side thumbing through the cards for a get out jail free one.

So with two candidates of such vast personal differences, one running the company for over 30 years while the other willing to Risk it all for some kind reason; the company decided to hold an actual public election. The company said, we will let the people decide who runs the business, .. the practical or the “player” and let the fates decide.
